Living through the COVID-19:

Sunday 05/17/20:

I'm still shocked to see how far I've come and school is officially close to an end. I woke up decently late at around 12 pm. I knew I had a big assignment due and had to get to it as soon as possible. I felt so much pressure and so little time. My shift was at 4 pm and that meant I only had three hours to get it done.

I built up the courage to call the day off because I felt like I needed to do well on the assignment. So, school came first then work. I've haven't really called off a Sunday before but it had to be done. I ended up not going to work today and focused mainly on homework. Finals around the corner this week has been busy with non-stop homework assignments. My cousin ended up coming by for lunch. She was surprised to see me doing more homework. She thinks that I only get like one assignment and boom I'm done for the week. But so far that hasn't been my case and at least not this week. Because I took the day off today, I didn't get to spend time with her and had to apologize for the lack of attention. She did invite me to a movie night at her place and I told her about my availability. But it's funny because are age difference is quite big. I mean she's 12 and has way too much energy for me. But at least she is understanding and doesn't push my buttons multiple times. She did push my buttons today but it's because she was being quite annoying. But I mean I was understanding after and apologized in cased I scared her. Because we don't really see each other often. But I ended up taking a baby nap to take a break from my homework and next thing you know she already left. I think I said goodbye but I don't really remember.

I ended up finishing my assignment late at night. My night was alright and I'm about to sleep. It was weird not going to work today.
