The measure targets those whose current status will expire between March and June, including short-term stayers such as tourists.

At present, immigration counters nationwide are crowded with foreigners, including short-term stayers, who are applying for extensions of their stay in Japan, with some of them unable to return home due to tighter border control across the globe.

The agency had earlier granted one-month extensions for foreigners whose residency status or period of stay expires in March and April, excluding short-term stayers.

Foreigners who are unable to return home will not be treated as illegal overstayers for 90 days after the expiry date of their visas, the agency said.
