Back to the laziness and unscheduled mess of the weekends during quarantine. Much like every other weekend day, I slept in late, worked on some homework and then watched Netflix with my mom. We finished watching yet another true crime series today. I have also been reading articles in the New York times as a way to pass the time but also do something a little more productive than simply sitting around and watching TV or scrolling through social media.

The New York Times has interactive maps on their website that shows the breakdown of coronavirus cases by country, state, and even each county. Seeing the map of the United States is a little scary when you see that most of the cases are concentrated in the northeast. I have family that lives in New York, including my grandparents and it's scary to think about the possibility that they may come into contact with the virus.
